

Latin Hegemony Council

A few years back, the Jet Propulsion Laboratory ran a summer workshop for top scientists on the subject of Terraforming planets like Mars for future colonization. Going unnoticed for more than a decade, a group of Mexican Social Scientists began meeting in an exclusive mountain retreat near Temosachic Mexico. Borrowing the JPL template, their secret goal was to completely Latinize Los Estados Unidos. A mindful subtext of recovering lost territories was a priority, but set aside to be addressed after a successful Mexiforming of American Culture.

Phase Uno: Exporting Corona, Dos Equis, Modelo, Patron, and Chavez Tequila proved effective beyond expectations to wet American appetites for Mexican produced alcoholic beverages that in turn deadened the senses of made-in-America consumers.

Phase Dos: Next came the incredible edible Taco, the perfect culinary companion for Mexican brews, followed by the Burrito, the Chimichanga, Quesadillas, Guacamole, Nachos, Enchiladas, and Fajitas. Americans were hooked. Restaurants were encouraged to throw in Spanish rice and refried beans to complete the toxification. The deadly Jalapeno, once digested, creates a craving that has mystified medical science. There is no known cure.

Phase Tres: A taco truck on every corner is already a near realization. For good measure, flood the borderlands with Mariachi music, perfect for broken hearts and magically makes you want more Mexican food and beer. Put up signs in Spanish everywhere and charm the Yankees with bright colors and the seductive musicality of the language. Flood the markets with Piñatas, Serapes, and Sombreros.

Phase Quatro: Elect Latin politicians. Take over Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California.

Es 's todo bien
